I can't find anything in the XCSCOPE Reference or the ExpressionEngine Online Documentation, can someone shed any light on this? A: The client does not have an Express license, the server does. The normal workflow is for the client to download a License package and then send it to the server where it can be installed. From the client's perspective, the License package will be complete (with all the details, such as a registered email address for the customer and what License type) and will include the Express license. The server has no idea that the client is using the Express package, but the server knows what the license back to the client, the server will need to call the CreateLicenseFromExpressionEngine method of the XCSCOPE object, and provide the LicensePackage that contains the details about the Express license and the contact details. By Joel Mokdad In the first of a two-part series, Pulitzer Prize-winning photographer Joel Mokdad looks at how the Iraq War has changed the story of his own family. It was the year my father lost his job at the US government because of his religious beliefs. We had been living off my parents' retirement savings, but that ran out and we had to move out of our comfortable middle class neighborhood into an apartment in the suburbs. As the years passed, my parents got older and their health declined. I did my best to provide for them, but thin
